WHAT REMAINS AFTER DAWN

VALZ (Nenchou Centric) Fan Novel | 130p | EN

He remembers a name he should have never known: Nagao Kei.
A strange, harmless demon with no past—and yet, somehow, memories of a life that was never his.
Kaida sets out to find the truth behind them.

Outside the office windows, the city carried on as usual. Afternoon sunlight stretched across the floor. Somewhere down the hall, someone laughed. Ordinary sounds from an ordinary day.

Yet somehow, the map lying on the table felt entirely disconnected from that normalcy. Because patterns meant intent. Patterns meant repetition. Patterns meant purpose. And purpose implied thought.

Kaida's gaze remained fixed on the marked locations. The feeling gnawing at the back of his mind had finally taken shape. Demons could be territorial. They could be reactive. Some were even intelligent enough to adapt. But this was different. This looked almost like a habit. Like a routine. Like someone taking the same route home every evening after work. The comparison sent an uncomfortable chill through him. Demons weren't supposed to behave like people.

When Genzuki finally lifted his gaze from the map, the easy smile that usually lived on his face was gone. In its place was a thoughtful frown, subtle but unmistakable. His finger hovered over the route traced across the district before he looked at the other two.

"Is it mimicking a human's schedule?"

The question settled heavily over the room. For the first time since the report had arrived, nobody had a joke ready. Kaida's eyes dropped back to the documents spread across the table. The map. The timestamps. The witness statements. The same locations appear again and again with almost unsettling consistency. Slowly, his gaze moved to the notes written in the margins.

Observed sitting quietly.

Observed watching traffic.

Observed feeding stray animals.

The words stared back at him. On paper, there was nothing alarming about them. No reports of attacks. No signs of aggression. No disappearances. No injuries. Compared to most cases crossing his desk, this should have been reassuring.

Instead, it left a cold feeling crawling beneath his skin. Because demons weren't supposed to look harmless. Over the years, Kaida had encountered every kind of entity imaginable. Some were violent. Some were intelligent. Some were passive until provoked. He knew better than anyone that hostility alone wasn't what made a demon dangerous.

A predator didn't stop being a predator simply because it wasn't hungry. Yet every instinct he had developed through years of research kept searching for the threat hidden beneath these reports and finding nothing.

That was what bothered him.

The absence. The gap where something should have been. The entity wasn't hunting. It wasn't attacking. It wasn't even avoiding people. If anything, it seemed woven into the neighborhood itself, appearing at the same places, at the same times, as though it had become part of the district's daily rhythm. Like a commuter following the same route home every evening. Like a resident.

The thought sent a chill down Kaida's spine. His fingers tightened slightly against the edge of the report. Because demons weren't supposed to belong anywhere. But this thing sat on rooftops and watched traffic. It lingered in parks. It fed stray cats. And somehow, that was far more unsettling than if it had simply attacked someone.

Across the table, Nagao remained unusually quiet. The office suddenly felt smaller than before. Outside, the late afternoon sun continued its slow descent toward the horizon. The same time the sightings always began. At the same time the thing would appear. And for the first time since opening the report, Kaida found himself wondering if the question wasn't what the demon was doing.

But why?

The question lingered in Kaida's mind long after the others had fallen silent. It sat there like a splinter beneath the skin, impossible to ignore no matter how many times he circled back through the evidence. The route made sense. The repeated appearances made sense. Even the possibility of a demon exhibiting unusual behavior could be rationalized if he stretched his understanding far enough.

What didn't make sense was the purpose behind any of it.

After several moments, he finally shook his head.

"... I don't know."

The admission tasted bitter. Kaida disliked uncertainty on principle. Years of research had taught him that every phenomenon left traces, every anomaly followed some kind of logic, and every mystery eventually yielded to enough observation. Yet the more he studied the reports spread across the table, the less certain he became. Every answer seemed to create two new questions.

His gaze shifted toward Genzuki. A thought had been lingering at the edge of his mind since they started discussing the case.

"Is it possible," he asked slowly, choosing each word with care, "that we're looking at the wrong category entirely?"

Genzuki tilted his head, but didn't answer yet.

"What if it isn't a demon at all?" he continued. "What if this is one of the gods' doing?"
